icksburg and Fort Hudson, interrupting contact between the two, an important piece strategy. It is the opinion of "old salt Mississippi that if this intrusion into the delta by the bayous of the South is carried to the mouth of the Mississippi, the influence will go on stretching, widening, and enlarging until it enters the Red river with such a carry that river entirely through the bayous of Louisiana and along the course of that river to the Gulf of Mexico. An examination of Colton's A General good map, will show the possibility of this.

In addition to the force of this speculation is that twenty-five years ago, it was found necessary to prevent the Red river from flowing into Atchafalaya, and by that course finding its way to the Gulf of Mexico. The intention will not fail to perceive that, if any man of the Mississippi stream is allowed to
